28 Must-See Exhibitions Opening Across the United States This Fall

BY STEPHANIE SPORN

August 18, 2023

With museum exhibition schedules packed more densely than ever, there are a lot of shows to visit this autumn. While titans of art history, such as Ed Ruscha and Judy Chicago, will be the focus of comprehensive retrospectives in New York, there are also countless opportunities for discovery—whether it's cutting-edge contemporary artists Yvette Mayorga and Donna Huanca, both of whom will have their first major solo shows on the East Coast, or overlooked female makers from centuries past. Ahead, exhibitions across photography, textile art, performance art, and more that everyone from art historians to gourmands and film buffs will delight in experiencing.

Tracey Emin and Donna Huanca at Faurshou New York

Since Faurshou, a Copenhagen-based contemporary private museum and art advisory, opened an exhibition space in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, in 2019, it has become known for its thought-provoking juxtapositions of cutting-edge artists. Its latest duo—renowned British artist Tracey Emin and rising American artist Donna Huanca—will each have solo shows bridging immersive installation and performance this fall. Exhibited for the first time in the US is Emin's Exorcism of the Last Painting I Ever Made. In 1996, the artist locked herself naked in a room at a Stockholm gallery for three weeks to confront her fear and guilt around painting, a medium she had abandoned six years before. Visitors could peer into the room through fish-eye lenses in its exterior walls. The entire room, including the dozens of works Emin produced there, now make up this installation.

Huanca's first major institutional solo presentation in New York City, SCAR TISSUE (BLURRED EARTH), is a multisensory work that includes paintings, sculpture, sound, and a series of live performances. Seeking to dismantle the hierarchy between artist, performer, viewer, and institution, Huanca conceives performances with the body as a living sculptural entity, often vibrantly painted. October 21 to July 14, 2024.
